FLASHBACK

INT. middle school gym

Wide Shot. There are ten students with Ella sitting in the middle. She's narrating.

Do you remember those middle school dances where no one actually talked, or rarely even made eye contact? Where the only sweat you broke on the dance floor was because of how nervous you were that you were finally standing four inches away from that someone you liked?

This was my highschool dance. It was supposed to be the best night of my life, and unfortunately it sucked.

I didn't have a date, my dress was the wrong color, and to top it off I didn't even know how to dance. I would like to tell that awkward girl sitting there to say something, to look up for once. To finally stop worrying because the guy next to her wasn't going to notice her braces, bad hair, or the fact that she may have possibly stuffed her bra with cotton balls and tissues. But I can't. You might ask why not? It can't be that hard. People grow up; they break out of the field of wallflowers. But you see some things really never change. At least, not yet.
